The House of Representatives passed the "Raise the Wage Act" in July 2015, but the Senate is dragging its feet." A couple weeks ago, we reported here that the Raise the Wage Act was introduced in the Senate on May 8th by Senator Sherrod Brown. The following is an excerpt from the bill summary: "Provides a 1.5% pay raise for low-wage workers in both the public and private sectors; makes a 0.5% pay increase automatic for all workers every year thereafter." We also reported that this bill could be introduced "within the next week or two," and Sen. Brown reiterated this yesterday at a town hall. It seems that Sen. Brown is in a bit of a hurry to get this bill passed before the new Congress starts, so needless to say, they haven't mentioned a timeline yet, but it's definitely on the horizon! We expect a vote to take place in the coming weeks in the Senate. For more information on Sen. Sherrod Brown's Raise the Wage Act, visit here. Want to help the fight to raise workers' pay? Q: Choosing between TFS and MSBuild for automatic test builds We're in the middle of the whole Visual Studio 2010 / TFS / TFS2010 test automation cycle. With our current project set up the build automation and execution of our unit tests is fairly easy. If a new build definition is added it automates the execution of the tests, which works as expected. However, we want to run our tests when a developer checks in code. The scenario we have in mind is having multiple developers working on a project, each with a branch, and we want to run the automated tests against their branch. I've seen a couple of options when it comes to running the tests: Create a new build definition and have this run as part of our existing daily build (which runs our automated build). Write a script that runs MSBuild against each developer branch and runs our tests on the resulting projects. We'd add the script to the branches in the source control management. Which option do you think is best? I'm not too experienced with TFS, so I'm unsure about best practice, so any help is appreciated. A: You can use MSBuild command line, and modify the MSBuild file so that it takes an argument to indicate the branch you want to test. Use a batch script to run msbuild against a number of branches, passing in the branch name as an argument. No, Not Yet Last week, I summarized the Schreier Commission on the Future of Jewish Education and concluded with these remarks about the commission's report, "Reinventing Jewish Education: Stakeholders Respond." As you know, the Schreier Commission was charged with making recommendations on the future of Jewish education, and from all of the interviews conducted, it is clear that this must include an assessment of the efforts at reform in that area. But first, an examination of the report, "Reinventing Jewish Education: Stakeholders Respond." Reading it was an eye-opening experience, even to a resident with a level of knowledge about school governance. It was as if my learning experiences in the schools of the 1960s and 70s had been compressed into this 400-page report. I came away feeling an urgency to be part of this discussion and these proposed changes. As a former principal, I think I have a particular insight and
